Edward Hopper & Andrew Wyeth Talk by Arthur Rainville. Edward Hopper once said, "I've always been interested in approaching a city in a train...the sensation, human nothing." Andrew Wyeth once confided; "As a frail child, I was left alone a great deal of the time." That "terrifying quality" of time always affected his art making, calming his turbulent thoughts. Yes, artists have always relied on solitude for their creative process and private well-being. Certainly, the whole human spirit thing can be complicated at times. Fortunately, answers to living a lush, full life can often be found in the world of art. "A Walk with the Poets of Solitude," a presentation by Arthur Levi Rainville, speaks of the effect "still" can have on a more inspired, satisfying life. Arthur will set aside the sound-bite approach of today and dip into the intriguing work and backstories of secretive artists. Hopper fought through prolonged periods of inertia before he felt his purpose - to make realist work to "cause a stir in the world." Wyeth quietly played on the human psyche, emotions, to discover his private vision. This presentation will delve into the real-time connectivity that the power of art possesses to transform our lives. "A Walk with the Poets of Solitude" celebrates the mystical powers of art waiting for us all.

Join us for an evening of adventurous eating using Salvador Dalí's recipes from his Les Dinners de Gala. Most of the recipes were by chefs of cuisine classique like Maxim's Lasserre, La Tour de Argent and Le Train Bleu. We will dine on crayfish, sea bass, quail, roast side of beef and assorted fruit desserts. We'll put a pitcher of his "Casanova Cocktail" on the tables to get the "Gala" going!!

"When I was six years old," Salvador Dalí (May 11, 1904–January 23, 1989) once professed, "I wanted to be a cook." But it wasn't until his late sixties that he channeled his childhood fantasy into Les Dinners de Gala — a lavishly illustrated cookbook, originally published in 1973 and featuring Dalí's intensely erotic etchings and paintings. The twelve chapters each cover a specific class of dishes — from exotic courses to fish and shellfish to vegetables — rendered with a surrealist twist both gastronomically and aesthetically, but nowhere more so than in the tenth chapter, dedicated to aphrodisiacs.
